Is there any way to make it happen? A: The application is validating the integrity of the file by checking the certificate used to sign the .exes file. The fact that it's complaining about the certificate being not signed by a trusted authority means that you're probably using some kind of virtual machine and the encryption is not being applied in the same context as the application that created the file. You can change this by using the following command on the console: `set ACTIVATEBINARY=0`

Q: ASP.NET Webforms - Should a business layer or data layer be used? I'm coming from a Java background, where business layers are used in conjunction with database access to create a data layer for the application. As far as I know ASP.NET Webforms doesn't have a concept of a data layer that you can create out of the box. So I was wondering if it's best to create business classes in the code behind files or if it's better to create these classes in a separate project and reference them to the pages.

A: ASP.NET WebForms have an implicit DataContext. So there is no real need for an additional DataContext. By the way: The project you mentioned ("Java") is Java Webstart. That's about equivalent to a (now deprecated) ASP.NET Web Application.

Q: TypeScript3 resolver confused when there is no type mapping from one type to another Is there any reason why the type system would allow the resolution of:

class A { foo: string; }
class B { bar: { foo: string; }; } interface Foo { foo: string; } declare module _ { export class A implements Foo { foo; } } declare module _ { export class B implements Foo { foo; } }
...into:
declare module _ { export class A implements Foo { foo: string; } }
declare module _ {
